7 and another in 1.1 to make things even better. I'll have my review of the new updates on the blog in a few weeks, but it's time to take a quick look at the 1.1 release. This post will focus on the TK7 panel's ability to allow you to convert your photo's mask and create luminosity masks for all of your image editing needs. To get started, we'll cover how to export a luminosity mask and use it for all types of adjustments in the tools we'll be using in the rest of this article. Once you've created a mask, you can save it to a file or export it to use with Photoshop's layers panel. It is also possible to use the luminosity mask with other tools like the Clone Stamp, Burn, Dodge, and Blur tools. Let's take a look at some of the new additions, updates, and refinements to the TK7 panel that make it an essential part of any digital photographer's work flow. Before we get started, here is a quick overview of what the TK7 panel does and the different settings you'll find in its Options menu. New in 1.1 The new version of the panel includes some changes to the way you can create, edit, and save your luminosity masks. You can now edit the luminosity mask in the panel's Preference dialog, and then save the changes. This allows you to keep a close watch on the mask while making adjustments. With that in mind, you can access the Change Luminosity Mask Preference Options dialog and then either Save, or Save As New Luminosity Mask. You can also open a luminosity mask from the Other Palette if you've already opened it. This will open the masked image along with the mask and the masked image itself. The masked image will be in one layer, and the mask will be in another. You can adjust luminosity masks in the main TK7 panel or in the panel's Preferences dialog. Simply click the Adjust Luminosity Mask icon in the top-right of the panel, and you'll get the dialog. Once you've made your changes, click Save. The mask will update immediately. You can also edit your Luminosity Mask's orientation directly in the panel's Preferences 82157476af
